> STAR INVESTIGATION

Amid growing pressure, a dozen years after the Star began to probe racial bias in policing and exposed the disproportionate documentation of black males, Toronto's police chief has ordered the practice halted — for now

Toronto Police Chief Bill Blair has suspended the controversial practice of carding. A written order issued by the chief Jan. 6, said carding will be "suspended until further notice," according to Toronto police spokesperson Meghan Gray, who said in an email that Blair would not be commenting on the decision until next month. "The chief will not be speaking publicly on the issue until he has had an opportunity to discuss it with the board at the next meeting," says Gray. The move comes after a December police board meeting at which Mayor John Tory, in his first appearance at the board, said the continuation of carding was "inconsistent with how we do things in Toronto and Canada. And let me say this." The board passed a motion asking the chief to finalize pending procedures by Feb. 10 that are in line with the board's new community contact policy — which passed in April and emphasizes citizens' rights, including the right of an individual to walk away from the encounter if the person is not being investigated for a specific crime. But the task may have been too much for Blair. "I think the writing was on the wall," said lawyer Howard Martin, noting that new board member Shelley Carroll drew attention to the number of speakers at the December meeting who asked that the practice be stopped. "And obviously, and I say this genuinely it's better for the chief to do that... and come to the conclusion that they simply can't follow the guidelines established by the board last April," said Martin, a member of the Law Union of Ontario, which has been a vocal opponent of carding. CARDING continued on B3
